

The Weaveress

The heart of the goddess will always know she did the right thing for even the lords and ladies of Asgard must not stand against what must be.

But the heart of the mother will always feel the anguish of having betrayed her most beloved son.

Such is the burden of the queen. Such is the weight of Nauthiz that which needs to be done no matter what.

And while she spins the threads of fate, her own threads are spun for her.

Not even the gods and goddesses of Asgard are free. Not even the Nornir can step out of their roles because there can be no freedom without obligation and no empowerment without duty and responsibility.

And so she sits in silence with her spindle and her wheel, spinning powerful threads of magic and fate while other spin the thread of her own fate.

And while she does so, sometimes she cries.